Bob the Unicorn - Capt. John Tadrzak
Sir Oliver - David Maciver
Sheba - Morganne Reed

Once upon a time, the valiant adventuress Isabel and Unicorn Bob were camping under the stars. They were in a part of the forest where there were few villages, and it was the dead of winter so both were freezing cold.

I know what you're thinking! Why aren't they building a fire? The problem is, the queen of that kingdom, Zoulvisia, did not understand the two heroes and thought they were dangerous rebels. If they were to light a fire, her knights might see it and attack. Just as Bob was about to give up and start one anyway, they heard a strange noise in the dark woods behind them. What could it be?

That sounds dreadful! How could the lovely queen Zoulvisia want to maim the flying cats? There must be something else going on, why don't we hear from Sir Oliver in the palace gardens?

It sounds like some of the flying cats have been killing little children! How can we blame Zoulvisia for locking them up to keep her people from further harm?

Sir Oliver is not very happy with having to be brutal to the flying cats, but he has his duty to perform to protect the kingdom. What will Isabel think of the cats trapped in a dreary castle having their wings hacked off one by one?

It seems the flying cat, Sheba, has led the duo to where her kind is being held. Isabel is determined to free what she believes are the wronged creatures, and perhaps some of them are. I don't remember hearing about a trial myself.

Sheba quickly led the way to where her friends were, flitting delicately past torchlit walls. Isabel unbarred the heavy oak doors and swung them open. To her horror, all the cats were already wingless and lay sobbing on the cold stone floor. How could anyone be as cruel as this? Just as she was thinking of a way to free the poor creatures, Sir Oliver marched up and confronted her, sword in hand.

Sir Oliver wasted no time, but turned on the helpless Sheba, “I recognize you!” he shouted, “you killed half the children in Machynlleth!” and without another word, or waiting for Sheba’s explanation, he charged toward her.

Now that the cats have been led to safety, let us hope they have learned their lesson and will not harm anyone else.

For now, they found themselves injured and almost alone in the cold dark woods, huddling under trees in the only patches devoid of snow, licking at their wounds.

Isabel quickly found Bob and the others, but the mood was not very cheery.

Isabel started a small fire in a hollow, where the knights would not see it, and sat down to warm her hands. Sheba came up as well. Let's hear what they are talking about by the campfire:

Let us hope Zoulvisia knew what she was doing when ordering the cats to be treated like that. She isn't an evil queen, but I think she should have made sure the flying cats were responsible for the murders before having their wings chopped off. Sir Oliver seemed fairly certain Sheba had done something bad, and Isabel will make sure the cats will not hurt anyone else.

THE END (for now)
